General Information

Overview

This unit explores how culture, social systems, community structures, and broader contextual factors shape health and wellbeing across diverse population groups. You will critically examine how these intersecting influences shape public health experiences and outcomes, with particular attention to Australia's cross-cultural landscape. Emphasis is placed on culturally responsive, ethically informed, and context-sensitive public health practice. You will analyse complex community health issues and reflect on how culturally attuned, collaborative perspectives can inform more equitable and meaningful public health outcomes. By completing this unit, you will strengthen your capacity to work effectively with diverse communities, interpret health challenges through cultural and systemic lenses, and contribute to informed and culturally responsive public health practice across varied settings.

Previous Student Feedback

Feedback, Recommendations and Responses

Every unit is reviewed for enhancement each year. At the most recent review, the following staff and student feedback items were identified and recommendations were made.

Feedback from Student feedback and self-reflection

Feedback

To adjust the due date of the first assessment to provide students with increased spacing between the two assessments, allowing for better workload management and reduced pressure.

Recommendation

To change the Assessment 1 due date from Week 9 to Week 7, allowing a better distribution.
