General Information

Overview

In this unit, you will evaluate the social and cultural influences and determinants of health, and their relationship to the safe and quality use of medicines, emphasising culturally safe care for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples. You will perform comprehensive patient assessments and interventions tailored to specific patient groups, including obstetric, neonatal, paediatric, geriatric, and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander patients, incorporating advanced care planning and culturally appropriate practices. The unit also embeds interprofessional education to develop competencies in collaborative care for diverse patients, fostering an understanding of multidisciplinary roles, referral pathways, and the effective use of information provided by allied health professionals and home carers. These elements promote the delivery of safe, coordinated, and holistic care. You will apply advanced communication strategies to manage complex interactions and respond to patient needs in line with professional standards, integrating ethical and legal frameworks into paramedic practice to ensure patient safety, informed consent, and advocacy, particularly for vulnerable and at-risk populations.
